Summary of Course

In this course, you will be immersed in the competing and politicised discourses and school level practices that play a part in what is known as Indigenous education in Australia. The aim of the course is to equip you with skills, knowledge and the confidence that will support you in becoming an active and aware contributor to improving teaching practices and learning outcomes within the Indigenous education landscape. Informed by ideas and strategies coming from a range of theoretical frameworks, you will critically engage with the literature and research that underpins Indigenous education, challenging you to reflexively position yourself within this landscape as active agents of change.

Aims of the Course

This course aims to:
- To distinguish, clarify and investigate concerns with the teaching of Indigenous studies, the teaching of Indigenous students, and how these come together as Indigenous education
- To encourage students to develop a deeper understanding of their location and relationships within the Indigenous education landscape
- To develop students knowledge, skills and confidence to critically engage with research and literature that contributes to constructing and sustaining Indigenous education

4. RATIONALE FOR THE INCLUSION OF CONTENT AND TEACHING APPROACH

There is currently a renewed concern and focus on Indigenous education within Australia. While primarily this is directed towards teaching and learning in the primary and secondary sectors, attention has also turned to higher education and in particular to the preparation of educators for these sectors. This course aims to contribute to these efforts by providing students with an opportunity to deepen their engagement with, and understanding of, the complexities of working within the Indigenous educational landscape. The approach taken for the course accepts that one of the reasons why little sustained or wide-spread improvement has occurred despite nearly 40 years of concerted effort, is to do with an ongoing inability to effectively account for impacts arising from socio-historical issues such as race, socio-economic status, language, and geographic location as continuing to underpin policy, curricula and pedagogic practices.

5. TEACHING STRATEGIES
The course is designed to be a reflective and collaborative investigation of the highly politicised Indigenous education landscape. To develop the students understanding and familiarity with the competing and at times contradictory discourses that construct this landscape, the course will use a combination of lectures, guided reading, small group discussion, and individual reflection. As the students are being asked to locate and consider their relationships within this landscape, some students may find the readings and discussions challenging and confronting, with the approach to the course designed to create an environment that is encouraging, supportive and safe to explore, take risks, and make mistakes. Students are asked to keep in mind that everybody will be entering the course with different levels of knowledge, understanding and confidence, and to promote deep and enriching learning for all, students are expected to attend classes fully prepared to engage with the readings, share their ideas, listen to the ideas of others, and be committed to learning to think in different ways and to respect the learning of others.

Task One: Theoretical framework

Aims of the task:

1. To identify and summarize key ideas and practices in each of the five theoretical frameworks being investigated across the course, and
2. To demonstrate your ability to synthesize and apply your understanding of the theoretical frameworks in the policy context of Indigenous education.

Description of the task:

Please refer to Moodle for additional details

Task Two: Research essay

Aims of the task:

1. To investigate the curricular and pedagogic challenges and opportunities when engaging with Indigenous perspectives and knowledges within the discipline (teaching area) that you work, and
2. To demonstrate a theoretically informed understanding of the practices involved in effectively responding to the Cross-Curricular Priorities related to the educational settings you operate within.

Description of the task:

For this task, you are being invited to investigate and construct a response that considers the challenges and opportunities of contributing to Indigenous education from your perspective and location within the educational landscape itself. For many of you, this will be based on being a classroom teacher, however, if you are involved in education as a school leader or education researcher (for example), you can undertake this task from this location. The policy framework connected with this task is the National Cross-Curriculum Priorities that require all teachers to embed Indigenous knowledges, histories and perspectives in teaching and learning. It is important to note that this policy document is primarily concerned with the learning experiences of non-Indigenous students and the work of the largely non-Indigenous dominated profession that is responsible for this.

You are to investigate and discuss examples of ‘good practice’ teaching and learning related to your teaching context and discipline. Your response will need to succinctly demonstrate an understanding of the curricular and pedagogic requirements related to your educational context. This will include offering a rationale that illustrates a philosophical and political awareness of why Indigenous knowledges and/or perspectives offer valuable contributions to the teaching and learning in this setting. The examples that you draw on will most likely come from settings that differ from yours in significant ways (potentially from other countries), meaning that you will need to additionally explain why these strategies are suitable for your context, and how you will change the practices to better suit your setting.

For this, you should either use one of the theoretical frameworks covered in the course, or alternatively you can draw from across several frameworks. In either case, you need to demonstrate a clear understanding of why you believe the theoretical framework and the ‘good practices’ that you aim to take up are suitable and relevant for the setting you work within.
